

CHAPTER 3. MAKASSAR ARISTOCRATIC SOCIAL ORGANISATION

One of the most dominant themes found in the Makassar texts involves recording aristocratic genealogical information (2.5.1). The level of detail promotes a reconstruction of the factors which determined access to title, as analysed in this chapter. The ensuing perspectives allow precise study, as undertaken in Chapter 4, of the shifts in political power between the "lineage groups", i.e. the kin-based factions of significance in the Makassar aristocratic world. The results show that the state of greater Gowa was organised along very similar principles to those recognised for the Malay sultanates (Gullick, 1988) and rural Javanese aristocracy (Palmier, 1969).¹

3.1 Traditional Makassar Social Categories

Classifying the ethnic groups of Netherlands India (Indonesia) into culture areas, ter Haar (1948) recognised a "South Celebes group" from the suite of similar features shared by the area's Islamised cultures - the Bugis, Makassar (including Konjo and Selayar), Mandar, and some smaller groups. Ethnographies dealing with the Bugis and Makassar, the best studied groups, reveal a general social system organised into overlapping sets of bilateral kindreds rather than sharply demarcated descent groups. Individuals can choose their particular affiliation, resulting in the crystallisation of discrete networks of (usually) related individuals. Postmarital residence can be either virilocal or (more usually) uxorilocal, the spouses retain membership within their natal group, and the children enjoy homologous relationships with the families of both parents. While the flexibility allows the ready incorporation of newcomers, the communities maintain their stability through physical and occupational propinquity and some measure of endogamy. An individual's behaviour is also strongly constrained by his or her status which is largely ascriptive, especially for women who, in the rôle of (principal) wife, mark the status attained by the more socially mobile men (Chabot, 1950; Millar, 1989; Acciaiolli, 1989).

The ascription of status is best described with reference to the pre-20th century situation, since some of the social divisions have been formally abolished even if the effects linger in more conservative areas (Röttger-Rössler, 1989:28 ff.). Mukhlis (1975:27-32), largely following Friedericicy (1933), adumbrates the Makassar subdivisions which had existed within the three general classes of aristocrats (I), commoners (II) and slaves (III).

I. Anak karaeng (aristocracy, literally children of karaeng), distinguished by their white blood inherited from the Tomanurung ("the one(s) who descended"). The Tomanurung, who are attributed with having founded most of the Bugis-Makassar kingdoms, are not all portrayed as epiphanies, as they also included nobles originating from earlier established kingdoms (Maeda, 1986). Subdivisions within the Anak karaeng were based on the proportion of white blood as against the red blood of commoners.

1. Anak tiknok; individuals with pure Tomanurung blood. They were further divided into the Anak tiknok pattola, those with a claim to the highest titles, and the Anak manrapik who could take up a highest title when no suitable Anak tiknok pattola individual was available.

2. Anak sipuwe; individuals with mixed Tomanurung and commoners' blood. They comprised the Anak sipuwe manrapik who could attain high titles if suitable Anak tiknok candidates were lacking, and the Anak sipuwe individuals born of an Ata nibuang slave (see below) by an Anak tiknok pattola father.

3. Anak cerak; individuals born of an Ata manak slave by a father of at least Anak sipuwe manrapik rank.

4. Anak karaeng sala. The father had Anak sipuwe or Anak cerak blood, while the mother had common or slave blood. These formed the majority of the Anak karaeng and also had the most interaction with the populace. They avoided marriages with commoners or slaves as any offspring could no longer claim enough white blood to be distinguished from commoners.

II. Tumaradeka (commoners, literally free people), divided into:

1. Tubajik or distinguished people, who could point to peripheral family connections with the Anakaraeng. Titles not regularly held by Anakaraeng were usually held among the Tubajik.

2. Tusamarak, the majority of the commoners, comprising peasants, merchants, sailors and so forth.

III. Ata (slaves). Individuals entered the state of slavery when they had lost their self-respect (sirik) and ability to fend for themselves. Slaves who sold themselves, the Ata niballi or Ata sossorang, retained the chance to buy their freedom back. The Ata nibuang, enslaved either as war captives or because of serious transgressions against adat customs, could have their formerly free status restored by the empowered adat council. The third group was the Ata manak or bequeathed slaves.

Several points emerge from Mukhlis' summary, as further summarised in Table 3-1. Access to titles depended on nobility of birth, i.e. status was ascribed. This essentially followed bilateral lines, and the ideal marriage involved similarly ranked partners. Nonetheless a patrilineal bias clearly existed, as shown by how the scheme derives the lesser nobility from marriages between a man of higher nobility and a female commoner or slave; the ascription of the father's status to the offspring of Anakaraeng women who married a lower ranked Anakaraeng man; and the specific stricture against women marrying beneath their class (cf. Chabot, 1950:94-95, 209ff.; Röttger-Rössler, 1989:42-43).

Two logical corollaries follow. Within the traditionally polygynous Makassar society, higher status men generally had more wives. And as the white blood of the royalty can scarcely be derived from the red blood of commoners, the royalty must be able to trace their origins from outside of the bilateral network - hence the Tomanurung. An example from recent history comes from the Konjo living at Kasepekan in the Gowa highlands. In the late 19th century a lowland Gowa aristocrat called Daeng Bunding married into the Kasepekan nobility and was installed as Karaeng. Kasepekan's Karaeng and other prominent aristocrats now trace a real or fictional genealogical relationship to Daeng Bunding through his three official wives (Röttger-Rössler, 1989:38-40).

3.2 Traditional Makassar Titulation

The Makassar texts (2.2) identify individuals' status not in terms of the categories shown in Table 3-1 but rather by title. Mukhlis (1975:41-42) describes the main kinds of names and titles used during the 17th century.

- a. Areng kale (personal name), the birth name.
- b. Areng padaengang (daeng title), the highest title a commoner could receive (Mukhlis, 1975:37). It can be abbreviated to Dg (Daeng) and Dta (Daenta). The title was sometimes linked with a place name, apparently to identify the person as a prominent member within the community (Table 3-16 below).
- c. Areng pakkaraengang (Karaeng title, or lordship), which can be abbreviated to Kg (Karaeng) and Kga (Karaenga). The title was usually associated with a place name (Table 3-16) which identified the community whose obligation it was to maintain a fit residence for the Karaeng, and provide manpower and surplus produce (Mukhlis, 1975:42-44,64).
- d. Areng arakna (Islamic name). Mukhlis uses this category to indicate the title of sultan.¹
- e. Tumenanga (posthumous name). Like the Bugis counterpart Matinroe (see Tables 3-3 and 3-4) the name usually indicated where the person had died. It provided a means in which prominent, deceased people could be referred to respectfully, and did not necessarily indicate the attainment of a high title (e.g. Dg Mangemba Tumatea ri Bantang in Table 3-8).

Sultans were not the only rulers in South Sulawesi, even after the conversion of the aristocracy to Islam. As I wish to draw parallels between the sultanates and their local counterparts, I here follow standard Indonesian in adapting the word "raja" to refer to all rulers, and also use the term "kingdom" to refer to their domains. I further distinguish between the greater rajas, and the petty royalty or lesser rajas (both of whom enjoyed recognition as independent, white-blooded rulers).

Lesser raja titles (see Figure 3-1). Some lesser rajas had distinct titles, e.g. the Bugis Ratu who ruled Bulo-Bulo, and the 16th century Makassar entitled Karaengloe ("great chief"), Somba and Tumakgauka. Other lesser rajas belonged to historical successions, e.g. Sanrabone, Maros (2.5.1), Siang (Pelras, 1977), Agongnionjok (Kallupa, 1984), the "Limae Ajattappareng" confederation (Caldwell, 1988), and Laikang (cf. Kamaruddin et al., 1985-6:169; Andaya, 1981:128,137).

Greater raja titles (see Figure 3-1). Luwuk (the first South Sulawesi royal family to embrace Islam), Gowa and Tallok became formal sultanates at the beginning of the 17th century. Gowa's lesser allies, Sanrabone and Bulo-Bulo, did not become sultanates, indicating a distinction between the major and the lesser pro-Gowa royalty. As regards the three major Bugis agrarian kingdoms - Bone, Soppeng and Wajok - they initially eschewed the title of sultan for their ruler, presumably as a reaction to their forced conversion to Islam.² But the Bone and Soppeng rulers were undoubtedly great rajas on a par with the sultans, as shown by their triumph in the Makassar War.

Prior to Islamisation, great Makassar rulers were distinguished by a nickname ("Tu-" or person, followed by a passive verbal form) commemorating some highlight of their reign. All of the late 15th to late 16th Gowa rulers received such a nickname (apart from the deified Batara Gowa), as did some Tallok, Maros and Sanrabone rulers (Table 3-3). Analogously the Makassar royal diary (LB) calls Bone's La Tenritatta Sultan Sahaduddin "Tunisombaya". The only other person remembered by a nickname was Tuniawanga ri Kalassakanna, the main wife of Sultan Abdullah, the latter arguably the highest status Makassar man who ever lived.

The greater rajas, then, are the sultans, the rulers of Bone and Soppeng, and the nicknamed individuals. The sultans considered here also include the 17th century rulers of Bima and Sumbawa (Noorduyn, 1987b; see Figure 3-1).

² Bone's La Tenrirua Sultan Adam (r. 1607-1608) is the exception which proves the rule. He was expelled for his conversion to Islam (see Muttalib, 1980).

The Makassar titles were incremental, with duplications of titles as well as higher titles reflecting enhanced status. E.g. Sultan Abdullah's full name was "Palakkaya I Malingkaeng I Daeng Mannyori Karaeng Matoaya Karaeng Kanjilo Karaeng Segeri Sultan Abdullah Awalul Islam Tumenanga ri Agama Tumenanga ri Bonto Biraeng" (ST:14-15; SG:70). To take a Bugis example, Sahaduddin's full name was "La Tenritatta Datu Mario ri Wawo Daeng Serang Arung Palakka Petta Malampéké Gemmekna Tounruk [Tunisombaya] Sultan Sahaduddin Matinroe ri Bontoalak" (Andaya, 1981:43-4).

The records also contain three variants on the daeng title. The kare title may have been a slightly demoted variant, as it was rarely associated with a place name (3.4.1), while few individuals entitled Kare were also a Karaeng and none was a raja (Tables 3-5 to 3-14). On the other hand, the record that the [additional] daeng name of Dg ri Tamacinna was Kare Paeso (SG:50) suggests it may have betokened a slight elevation. The lokmok or lukmuk title displays idiosyncratic associations. It can occur alone, or in combinations such as I Kare Lukmuk (SG:15), Haji I Kare Lukmuk (LB:154), I Lokmok Manrimisik (SG:39) and I Lukmuk ri Mandallek (Patunru, 1983:24), but my records give only one association with a karaengship (Table 3-6). The title usually involves women of unknown birth who married prominent men (Table 3-10), notably in the case of a slave who took her lokmok title after marrying Sultan Mudhaffar (cf. ST:27 and LB:167). While the deeds of male lokmok are occasionally mentioned, their family relationships are ignored. The title therefore appears to have marked a common birth barring the holder from higher titulation.³ Finally, the gelarang title referred specifically to district heads who represented the governed populace, notably the nine council members of Gowa's Bate Salapang (Mukhlis, 1975:60-2).

³ Despite its unusual nature, the title was a variant on daeng, as shown by the record that a grinder-labourer called I Rasa took I Lokmok Tekne as her daeng name when she married Sultan Alauddin (SG:59).

3.3 Analysis of the Makassar Genealogical Records

3.3.1 Scope of the analysis

Rather than slavishly believe the ideology of traditional Makassar ranking, we should be able to reconstruct the social factors determining individuals' access to titles, based on the genealogical records covering approximately 200 years during which the same basic titular system applied. Factors of likely significance include gender and next-of-kin relationship, notably parent-offspring and husband-wife comparisons. As titles were incremental with age, the study should include only individuals who reached maturity, here defined as "marriageable age".⁴ The analysis will employ an ordinal model as it alone matches the ranked nature of titles as data (cf. Startup and Whittaker, 1982:4-7). The highest title received by a person, whether in single or multiple expression, is the title used to determine the person's rank. Rarely occurring titles, which most frequently involve cases of people with non-Makassar titles marrying Makassar aristocrats, do not constitute analytically useful categories and so are pooled with the Makassar title which I consider to be of equivalent rank.⁵

I recognise five ranks, based on the system of traditional Makassar titulation (3.2). Rank 1 refers to the greater rajas and Rank 2 refers to the lesser rajas. Rank 3 includes the remainder of the lords, i.e. the various Makassar karaeng and Bugis arung and datu whose constituencies were incorporated within one of the kingdoms, as well as an assortment of titles which appear to be of equivalent rank. Rank 4 people are the daeng and their equivalents, although note that the kare and lukmuk will often be tabulated separately from the other Daeng. Finally, Rank 5 includes those people for whom no evidence of titulation was found.

⁴ Some of those included may well have died when still young, particularly well-born people for whom neither a noble title nor a marriage is recorded. However, to avoid biasing the data base in favour of certain expectations, I will assume that people lived into adulthood unless the records show the contrary. Note also that the study will exclude some highly ranked children who had died at a young age - princes who had probably been viewed as likely successors before their death. These include Tunipalangga's son Kg Anak Gowa (SG:31), and Kg Segeri the son of Sultan Abdullah (ST:19-20).

3.3.2 Methodological Procedures

The major difficulty facing the use of the genealogical information in the Makassar texts is to identify the individuals referred to. Partly this stems from the lack of a gender distinction which Makassar (and the Indonesian translations) makes in pronouns and titles, and the frequent use of context rather than the explicit statement of the verb "to be" and its conjugations. For instance, a passage faithfully translated into Indonesian might read "Dia, anaknya Daeng A,...". The possible translation into English includes all variants on "He/she, the child of/whose child was male/female Daeng A". The multiplicity of names and titles which many of the individuals had, and the tendency for certain titles such as important karaengships to recur, also make it difficult to follow the records. On top of that, individuals could be referred to by any one of their aliases, usually reflecting the point that actions done at different stages in the same person's life cycle could be done, strictly speaking, under different names.⁶

In practice I found I could only resolve the ambiguities by taking on board the most feasible interpretations, based on context, and running them until contradictions demanded a rethink. In accordance with the principle of parsimony I have also reduced the number of names to the minimum number of discrete individuals. For instance, when a name occurred I consigned it to the individual or one of the individuals already identified by that name until I found evidence that another was involved. The evidence could be general, as in the case of very common names (e.g. "I Sitti" in Table 3-12) where, indications to the contrary lacking, one must assume different individuals were involved. Usually, however, specific evidence turned up, as with the possible identification (posited by Kamaruddin et al., 1985-6:100,107) of "Daeng Tallara" as the Daeng title of Karaenga ri Tabaringang who first married a Sanrabone raja and then married Karaeng Katinting. Here it can be shown that Daeng Tallara Karaenga ri Tabaringang who married the Sanrabone king was the full sister of Sultan Hasanuddin, the father of Karaeng Katinting - i.e. the identification has her making the unlikely marriage to her brother's son - and that indeed some other Karaenga ri Tabaringa had married Karaeng Katinting (SG:45,49). Nonetheless, I can see that some of my interpretations are conjectural, and these will be signified "(?)" in Tables 3-3 to 3-14 which list the reconstructions.

⁶ There is a fine line between producing patent nonsense by using anachronistic names (e.g. Sultan Abdullah was initially as interested in Christianity as in Islam) and relegating oneself to grammatical contortions by demanding strict synchrony (e.g. since even the birth names were bestowed a few days after birth, one would always have to say "the person who was later called..." when referring to a birth). The nicknames and posthumous names provide a means of referring to a whole life cycle, but as it turns out particular titles have become standard fare to fill this rôle (e.g. Arung Palakka, Kg Pattingalloang). This has led to the unfortunate situation where some highest attained titles have, as it were, been blotted out of historians' thinking, and consequently I will use the highest status name when referring to an individual's life cycle (e.g. Sultan Sahaduddin and Sultan Mahmud in the two cases just cited).

The tables include 545 individuals of identified name for whom at least one next-of-kin relationship - whether as spouses, full siblings or parent-offspring - could be deduced by following genealogical chains as far as individuals for whom no further data were apparent. The tables allow space for relationships which were not necessarily filled, signified by dashes, or were filled by some individual of unknown name as signified by a question mark. An exclamation mark is used for individuals reported to have died before reaching marital age. In addition, the men who held "bureaucratic" or non-territorial posts (3.5), listed in Tables 3-13 and 3-14, include 14 for whom no next-of-kin relationships are known.

As regards cases when the Makassar texts record a relationship of a person who appears in other texts, I have used secondary sources to clarify their standing with the Makassar lines, but I have not tried to follow the genealogical chains any further. As my period of interest stops at 1700 (2.6.4), I have consulted the later diary entries (Ligtvoet, 1880:231-259) only as far as extracting the most relevant, elucidatory information. The records I have collected could inadequately represent the marriages and titles of people born shortly before 1700, and so I have ignored people born after 1670, apart from prominent, widely documented figures.

3.3.3 Tabulation of the individuals

The great majority of the titles considered here involve toponyms (Figure 3-1). Table 3-2 details my system of abbreviations of the toponyms and non-territorial posts, designed to handle the complexities of the data in diagrammatic (Chapter 4) and tabular form. Tables 3-3 to 3-14 identify the individuals by their fullest known name, in the first column. In the other columns the name or abbreviation appears in capital letters whenever a karaengship or more lofty title is involved, otherwise in usual face. Occurrences of the abbreviations are numbered serially according to their apparent chronological order of appearance in the records, or are shown with Roman numerals when the individual belonged to a recorded royal succession.

3.4 Statistical Analysis of the Titulatory Data

3.4.1 Introductory comparisons

Let us exclude the three immature individuals in the tables, and the government officials whose next-of-kin relationships are totally unrecorded. This produces the cross-tabulation of title against gender shown in Table 3-15. The total of 545 individuals, more or less corresponding to the 16th-17th century individuals of genealogical significance to the Makassar aristocracy, is divided evenly between men and women. However, quite obviously the higher the rank, the greater the proportion of males compared to females, with only the lokmok and untitled ranks transposed.
